

ARCHAEOLOGY OF WAR IMPACT ON LANDSCAPE, SOCIETY AND MATERIAL CULTURE

How have war and conflicts transformed landscapes, communities and material culture in the Ancient World?

To answer these questions, historiographical research first turned to ancient texts, then to places where feats of arms occurred (battlefields, camps, etc.), but this approach has often led to a narrowing of the field of investigation to the conflicts themselves that have been re-counted and whose narratives have survived to the present.

But, by focusing on archaeology and material culture, we can explore lesser-known situations of conflict or conflictuality, and examine the impact on landscapes, societies and bodies in a different way. Over the last twenty years, archaeological research has made enormous progress investigating landscapes whose morphology and modes of occupation have been altered by war. The impact is not confined just to the front lines: one must ask how can regions, villages, and provincial capitals be altered by war, and how can these transformations be detected by archaeology?

Another significant aspect is the aftermath of war. How did societies evolve to overcome its effects, and what markers are left on material culture? The war effort, the confrontations themselves, the victories and defeats, lead societies to adapt their modes of production and territorial occupation, making it sometimes necessary for changes in location or structures in order to adapt to new political contexts created by conflicts. War also drives communities to change their religious practices and forms of representation, even their language and forms of expression, in order to come to terms with the loss of human life and to explain the material and social transformations brought about by conflict.
